ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

The author wishes to express her great gratitude to a number of dedicated instructors in the Linguistics Department, Graduate School of Payap University, namely Kirk R. Person, William J. Hanna, Karen Block, Audra Phillips, Kenneth N. Manson, Douglas Inglis, and Brian Migliazza, for their valuable advice and time in the production of this research.

Special gratitude is extended to Dr. Kirk R. Person, the author's supervising professor, who was endlessly patient and rigorous to edit and make insightful and helpful suggestions for this research. This work would not have been possible without his great support in every step of the research activities. He was always available for all difficulties that the author had encountered while working on this research. The author also would like to thank Dr. Brian Migliazza, the author's former advisor, for his strong guidance on how to produce academically acceptable research. The author also expresses her gratitude to her former 'Discourse Analysis' instructor, Karen Block, whose teachings have been considered a valuable and informative background for this research. The author also would like to thank her former 'Field Methods in Linguistics' instructor, Audra Phillips. It was she who initially introduced 'Toolbox,' a useful computer program for interlinearizing texts, to the author. Without the Toolbox computer program, it would have taken the author many tedious months in manually providing the interlinearized text. The author acknowledges with gratitude the help she has received from two software engineers in the Linguistics Department, Terry Gibbs and Tim Eves, for their professional expertise in dealing with the many computer problems the author experienced while doing this research.

The author also acknowledges Payap University, especially Dr. Boonthong Poocharoen, the President, for granting her a scholarship for her study and a study leave from her teaching duties. The author also would like to thank her colleagues in the English Department, Payap University, for their constant encouragement and for taking on extra teaching loads during the author's study leave. The author is extremely grateful to all librarians of Payap University, who were always willing to help the author to do a search both on the Internet and on the library shelves.

Finally, the author's deepest thanks are given to her family; her beloved parents who always give their great support and love, her husband, and her two daughters who have been patient with the author during her years of study. The author's heartfelt thanks are given to all of them.
